

Jason's Notes: Jan. 17, 2011

Two sneak peeks: This week on the show you're getting a chance to hear two records that will be released in the next few weeks. Gerald Cleaver's new album comes out on January 25 and Lynne Arriale's record hits the shelves on February 8.

I'm taking part in a month-long poetry project called a river of stones. The idea is to write a small poem (a "stone") each day in January. I'm going to attempt to write a stone each day this year, rather than just for a month. You can see all my stones at my blog:

I saw an incredible production of Hamlet last week done by London's National Theatre. It was shown in a movie theater here in Albany as part of a global broadcast. My thoughts on this production and its relevance to our surveillance-minded culture are here:

I'm still working on finding a job in NYC. Here's my resume:

This week on The Jazz Session:

TJS #232: Gerald Cleaver. Gerald Cleaver's new album, Be It As I See It (Fresh Sound New Talent, 2011), is a musical exploration of the Great Migration and its relation to his own family's history. In this interview, Cleaver discusses the musical and historical mission behind the formation of his band Uncle June; his use of spoken word and sound collages as additional layers in his compositions; and how he made careful decisions to arrive at his current place as a musician. SHOW AVAILABLE NOW.

TJS #233: Lynne Arriale. Pianist Lynne Arriale's new CD, Convergence (Motema, 2011), is her second album to feature a horn player, this time saxophonist Bill McHenry. In this interview, Arriale talks about her decision to expand her band; how she searches within herself as part of her compositional process; and why she enjoys teaching as a means of human connection. SHOW AVAILABLE STARTING 1/20/11.
